

The current regulation of broadband access keeps quality high by promoting competition among ISP's. If the phoneline owners such as Bell South or SBC are allowed to no longer make their lines available to small ISP's, then the broadband market will become too much like the cable tv market, where poor service and ever-increasing charges are the norm.